Trademarks cover an image or word or distinctive mark which individuals or businesses used to identify their products to consumers. These can be used to protect elements of your brand, from a brand name to a logo to a tagline.

Copyrights protect the authors of original works – for example a book, image, or musical piece. Copyright can also include the right to adapt or modify the work, distribute copies of the work, and display or perform the work (if it's a live art piece) in public. Pieces of IP that should be protected by copyrights include books, articles, white papers, and other original pieces of writing, as well as art and music.

Patents are the exclusive rights granted to inventors of new devices or processes. The inventors, through the patents, have the sole right to manufacture or use those devices or processes. Examples for using a patent might include the development of unique software or a new handheld device. Patents are valid when there's a true differentiating factor to the technology – an innovation – and it prevents competitors from simply copying your product.

CO-WORKING SPACES OR VIRTUAL OFFICES

When Vishal Gaba launched Movified, a social engagement platform for movies, he initially chose to work from home. However, as the team expanded, the need for office space became apparent. Since he didn't want to spend time on setting up an office from scratch, he thought of hiring a co-working space.

"It's necessary for the team to brainstorm together as it yields better ideas. I believe that working from a co-working space is not just a fad but necessity of startups. Firstly, a co-working space gives an office area without making a large dent in your pocket. Secondly, you are flocked by techies, startups, and entrepreneurs; and their help is readily available there. Thirdly is networking with these available talents."

Research shows that startups who work in a co-working space are four times more likely to succeed than those who don't. Working in these spaces ensures one will always be surrounded by like-minded, talented individuals and teams which can really benefit you in the short and long term.
